This potential fall is necessary to impart to the ion an energy sufficiently great so that it can bring about ionisation of the neutral molecule by impact. The accompanying curve or characteristic, Fig. I, shows the relation between these different currents as they appear on increasing the e. m. f. from zero, providing that a sufficiently great resistance is in the circuit. If an external ionizer is used, for example Roentgen rays, it is seen at first as shown in the figure that the current increases with increasing potential till a maximum is reached, while the ionisation by impact of the ions brought about by still greater potential difference appears first near the electrodes which are accordingly surrounded by a mantle of light. The middle or intervening stretch of gas remains dark. The characteristic now shows an increase in the current due to the increased ionisation. As soon as ionisation takes place along the whole intervening stretch of gas the current increases further while the potential difference of the electrodes falls--we have then the glow current. By increasing the current now, more heat is generated, and if the additional resistance is not great enough, the heating of the electrodes, especially of the cathode, through the bombardment of the electrons, is so great that with the simultaneous increase in the current and decrease in the potential the electrical discharge is carried by the vapor of the electrode. Till recently such a discharge has been designated...
