Excerpt: . . . principally at the larger end; but in four eggs from Wexford County, the entire surface is more or less thickly spotted with umber. In ground color, the eggs more nearly resemble those of the Catbird than any other species, but are not of so dark a shade of green. The Swainsons Thrush is the only one of the genus which lays spotted eggs. In the Fall migrations, the birds are found in the southern counties as late as October 1st, and a few stragglers occasionally even later. This Thrush is undoubtedly the most eccentric in its geographical range of any in its family famed for migrating. We learn that the Olive-back is known to Winter in Venezuela, while its northern haunts extend (probably) nearly to the Arctic circle. llylockhla vnaUiscte pallas (Cab.)
