Excerpt: .tuberculous joints, enlarged glands, spinal disease, and abdominal tuberculosis with tabes mesenterica are essentially diseases of infancy and childhood. A patient with enlarged glands, strumous joints, or spinal disease developing true pulmonary tuberculosis is seldom seen; indeed, clinically they seem antagonistic to each other. In 118 cases of phthisis pulmonalis none was observed with any other gross tuberculous lesion, something unavoidable if the infections were due to one bacillus. In 500 necropsies on cases of tuberculosis, the lungs were found to be attacked by two distinct varieties of tuberculosis, one of a slow and insidious nature, the other rapid, acute and generally associated with tubercle in other parts of the body. If one compares the appearance of cattle dying with tuberculosis with that of children dying with tabes mesenterica and abdominal tubercle, one is struck with the similarity. From these general clinical and pathologic...
